DEMOCRATIC LOVE FOR THE AFRICAN.

Mr. A. H. Stephens, the ex-Vice President of the … Confederacy, has … for the hundredth time … the emergency demanding this effort being the prevention of the Democratic party from taking the "New Departure." He states that if any Democrat has changed his … Republican … July, that the Democracy are not to be burdened any more with old issues, and are not going to fight any part of the … Thomas Hoyne, of this city, in his Fourth of July … party generally will … Democratic party will "return" to its old policy, and abandon the "departure" …

According to Mr. Stephens, the rebellion and the struggle for independent State sovereignty was the legitimate … of the old Democratic doctrine of State rights, and there never should have been any war to coerce those States; that, according to the same doctrine, reconstruction and all the amendments to the Constitution are frauds and outrages to which the Democratic party must pay no respect, and which, when it attains to power, it must treat as nullities. But, according to Mr. Hoyne, the doctrine of State rights, however right originally, had become a mere cover under which … protection was afforded to slavery, and that the departure of the Democracy took place when the party permitted itself to be drawn away from its early principles to make the National Constitution the bulwark of human slavery. He proposes, therefore, to "return" to the ancient faith, and he urges it the more strongly because he attributes all the calamities which have visited the country to that departure. Here, then, we have three distinct factions: First, the Departers; second, the Stand-Stillers; and, third, the Returners.

The interest which the Republican party has in these movements is that they indicate a future policy in the Democratic party which is calculated to free that organization of much of the popular odium which has followed it since 1860, and which has justly rendered the party, in the aggregate, at the North only in a slight degree different from the rebels in the South. The earnestness with which Jeff. Davis and Stephens have appealed to the Democratic party not to abandon the … the old-line Democrats feel that there is to be a general acquiescence of all parties in the policy of the Republicans, and in the grand results following the abolition of slavery, and the establishment of civil and political equality in the land.

There has never been in the history of parties in this or any other country so glorious a tribute to the patriotism, wisdom, perseverance … of party policy, as is shown in this universal approval and acceptance by the Democrats of the grand civil and military achievements of the Republican … The old Federal party never surrendered … hours of … adhered to Federalism, and sighed for the good old days of the elder Adams, and the "wholesome restraints" of the Alien and Sedition laws. The Whig party never surrendered. It never, by resolution or by vote, signified an approval of the acts or policy of its opponents. … But the Democratic party, claiming an organization in every State, and the ascendency in several States, proposes voluntarily to repudiate every distinctive point in its policy of the last … years, and to make the civil and political rights of the negro, the … payment of the public debt … the three great constitutional amendments, and their consequential legislation, the great Democratic points for the next campaign. In short, throwing behind them the past, and abandoning the Democratic platforms of twenty years, they propose to take the Republican platform of 1868, with such additions as time may have made necessary, and upon that ask the suffrages of the American people.

There is just one thing needed, and that, under … is important, to make this Democratic … formidable, and this is public confidence in the honesty or sincerity of the movement. To be successful, the Democrats must carry all the late slaveholding States. Does anybody in Illinois believe that the Democrats in Virginia, the Carolinas, Kentucky, or other Southern States, propose to enforce the laws which protect negro Republicans in their civil and political equality? Kentucky, to this day, refuses to allow a negro to testify in a State court in any case of debt or other trespass in which a white man is a defendant. Will Kentucky, with the administration of the national laws in the hands of Democrats, permit negroes to sit on juries, provide them schools, allow them to vote …? In what other State of the South will the rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments be any better respected than in Kentucky? The election of a Democratic President, upon whatever platform may be adopted, involves the immediate and general practical disfranchisement of the colored man in every case where their rights have to be … by Federal authority. This fact is too firmly impressed upon the popular mind to permit any success to the Democratic … for a renunciation to power.

A few months ago the officers of a bank in Philadelphia were visited by three persons claiming to be preventive police, who stated that they knew of a plot to rob and plunder the bank. They offered their services to … detectives in the vault, and to capture the expected burglars. They were employed, and when the officers came to the bank next morning they … In … the Democrats offer to become the special guardians of the civil and political equality of the negro, upon a par with the … detectives? But the people will not trust them with the custody of the government. No Democrat in Congress, or in any branch of any State Legislature, voted for or to ratify either the Fourteenth or Fifteenth Amendments. Will the American people now place any confidence in the offer of that party to become the special champions and defenders of those amendments?

The … revolution at Guatemala was progressing favorably at last accounts, and will doubtless be finished up in season for the July … The principal battle, which took place recently at a place called Chiche, was a … affair. The army of the government numbered nearly eight hundred men, under General Colonel Calonge. It fired one volley in good style, and the troops are … as having been "in fine spirits" up to the time when the … began to fire back. … of fraternizing … This left Lieutenant Colonel Calonge … Major …

One of the inconveniences of carrying on a war in Central America is that the troops, as fast as they become demoralized, … for the … of the … being apparently like that of the … sometimes … "man" picked off … to reinforce the army that sent the successful shot. It was expected, at the latest mail advices (June 1…), that the revolution, which is an anti-Jesuit one, would succeed.

THE TREATY IN CANADA.

The opposition to the treaty in Canada continues to be very bitter, and, like all Canadian political discussions, very denunciatory. The Minister, Sir John A. MacDonald, is denounced, and one of the opposition organs pronounces him the "Benedict Arnold of the Dominion." The Ministry and the opposition, in fact, care very little about the treaty, there not being one word said for or against the treaty itself; but the opposition oppose the treaty generally as a government measure, and therefore a swindle, while the Ministry observe a profound silence. Both parties are looking to the elections; the outs want to get in, and the ins want to stay in. The Ministry refuse to make the ratification of the treaty a government measure, and are trying to bridge over the elections without any issue on that subject. Their idea is, that if they can have the Parliament elected upon other issues, the power of the Ministers can carry the ratification.

The opposition to the treaty is a most … farce. Not a single paper in Canada has undertaken to show wherein the Canadas are not directly benefited by every section of the treaty. But denunciation of the Minister in the regular style of a hundred years ago in England is general, and the reorganization of the Ministry is the end sought by the men out of office. When Parliament meets everybody knows that the treaty will be ratified, no matter which party may be successful at the elections. The Dominion cannot afford to reject it.

LEGALIZING VICE.

The Common Council of St. Louis, having succeeded to its satisfaction in farming out the business of female prostitution, now proposes to take charge of the gambling traffic, and furnish opportunity to all sojourners within the city's gates to indulge in a "square" game of faro or keno—i. e., a game which is only about 20 per cent in favor of the dealer and against his patron. The game of faro being but … treated in the celebrated text-book of the Hoyle, the Common Council proposes to furnish rules and regulations by which the systematic fleecing of the greenhorns shall be carried on. It is proposed to charge $100 a month as license fees, and it is believed that, by judicious nursing, the business may be made to yield $20,000 a year to the city.

Now, this is doubtless a wise step for St. Louis to take, supposing the vice of gambling is to be encouraged at all by that municipality. But St. Louis does not want to encourage gambling as a public institution unless, first, the moral sentiment of that city has come to regard it as correct enough in an ethical point of view; and, second, the abundance of capital and the scarcity of opportunities for legitimate speculation render gambling the only means of gratifying the American's natural passion for turning his money over. In Chicago we do not need gaming as a public institution. Public opinion would not justify the gathering by the city of a traffic which is not only immoral and … but which is yet, unlike the vice of prostitution and some others, in its infancy, so far as our country is concerned, and can be the more easily suppressed by the authorities. Accordingly, our police authorities are so active in its suppression that no gambling shop, known as such, dares open its doors in Chicago. If this last assertion is not true (and we know it isn't) it is directly the fault of our Police Commissioners, whose names are Sheridan, Brown, and Gund, and who know well enough that public opinion demands the cleaning out of the faro-halls, and the prosecution of the professional gamblers, until they leave town or show that they have a legitimate calling.

BUTLER HEARD FROM.

Our Washington correspondent doubtless gave voice to an inquiry which has risen to the mind of many a reader of the political news of the time when he inquired, in his letter published yesterday: "By the way, where is B. Butler? …"

This inquiry carries the reader's mind to the billowy main; and, likening the … to a crafty mariner … it will be found, we think, that Captain Ben. has … been waiting for the … quarter, in order that he may trim his sails accordingly. The port toward which Captain Ben. is just now steering is the port of Boston. Whether or no the beacon is lighted and in order, this cunning skipper has no difficulty in discerning Beacon Hill, and toward that he proposes to steer his gallant bark. For why? Beacon Hill holds the State House, and the State House holds the Gubernatorial chair of Massachusetts—a good vantage ground, Skipper Ben. thinks, from which to move on whatever political positions he may have in his eye for the future.

Ben.'s craft looms upon the horizon, somewhat bigger than a man's hand, in the shape of an editorial, three columns long, in the Newburyport Herald, a modest Republican sheet, printed within the Essex District, and evidently inspired by Butler himself. It tries to impress Republicans, first, with a due sense of the importance of the recent New Departure of the Democrats—a movement which can hardly fail to render that party more dangerous than formerly to Republican supremacy. It describes the operation which the Democratic party has undergone as a transmigration of principles similar to that which Pythagoras supposed the human soul to undergo. … the supremacy which the Republican party has been able to maintain during so many years "is owing to no contrivance or compactness of party or organization, however perfect that organization may be, but to the earnest conviction of the American people upon the political questions out of which this war arose, and which have in turn arisen therefrom; their determination that these questions should be settled in accordance with those convictions, and their unwillingness to trust any other than the Republican party with the great interests at stake." Hence, the party must still be able to offer the same superior inducements in the way of principle which they have formerly done, or they cannot expect the same success, especially as the organization merely of the Democrats has usually been more complete than ours. While the Democratic party has the … responsibility, and has all the advantages of a party in opposition, says Mr. Butler or his spokesman in this affair, the Republican … on the other hand, is "encumbered and embarrassed by systems and measures that are obnoxious to the people, prejudicial to their material interests, and in some respects, it is seriously believed by many, inimical to the safety of the government." This is the "fix" in which he pictures the Democratic party of to-day: …

… calls a New Departure. We have warned the Republican party against resorting to unwise and extreme measures like Butler's Force Bill; against corrupting our legislation with jobs and steals, like Butler's Quincy granite, Fort Monroe, and Alta Vela speculations; and against peddling out the offices of trust and dignity to corrupt … like Butler's nephew at Alexandria. We have done this, believing the sentiments which we have expressed to be those felt, and earnestly felt, by a majority of honest and intelligent Americans, especially Republicans; but we have done it on behalf of abstract right and justice, knowing, at the same time, that it was only by a strict adherence to those principles that the Republican party could hope to maintain a permanent ascendency. We should felicitate ourselves considerably over the conversion of so hard a case as the member for Essex, if we had not learned, from that gentleman's public career, not to look for a change of heart as a concomitant of his frequent changes of policy and profession. The satisfaction to be derived from Butler's manifesto comes merely from the fact that the motives of demagogues are good indications of the direction in which the current of public opinion has set. Butler is one of those straws which show which way the wind blows, and, as a straw of this sort, Butler has few equals in the country. "The king is dead; long live the king!" is a cry in which Butler joins as naturally as a robin carols his lay, or (what is more apropos), as an Essex barnyard fowl joins in the cackle over an egg which some other fowl has laid. Whatever Butler may or may not be as a patriot and a statesman, few will deny that he is a pretty clever politician, and not bad at discerning the signs of the times, and placing himself rather ostentatiously at the front of any movement whose popularity is assured. When, therefore, he issues an address recommending a careful pruning of the Republican policy, a lopping off of the excrescences which years of excitement and of uninterrupted power have engendered, it is natural to conclude that the people are fully ripe for the proposed reform. At the same time we are obliged to withhold from Butler any larger amount of credit for his professed return to Republican first principles, since he has at best put out his pronunciamento as a feeler, and anonymously, so that its paternity may be denied if the season should appear to be unpropitious for political morality.

THE FINANCES OF FRANCE.

On the 20th of June President Thiers made a statement of the financial condition of France, and from it he claimed that the country would emerge from the difficulties triumphantly. He was especially severe upon the financial system of the empire. The late war had cost France $1,600,000,000. He considered that the resistance by Paris, and the vain attempt to prolong the war on the Loire, had been mistakes. Had peace been made before these the cost would have been only $300,000,000 for war expenses, and $500,000,000 of indemnity. The subsequent resistance had cost in money $800,000,000. He presented the budget for 1870; the expenses, $660,000,000; the receipts, $551,200,000, including the losses, showing a deficit of over $100,000,000. He estimated the deficit in the budget for 1871 at $197,200,000, or a total deficit for the two years of $325,200,000. The Bank of France had loaned all this to the government, except $60,000,000. The floating debt of France was never so low, amounting to only $150,000,000. Prussia was to be paid $400,000,000, of which $25,000,000 had been paid, and a credit obtained for the Eastern Railway of $65,000,000. The first instalment of the loan was only 15 per cent, but, if it was all paid in, the Prussian indemnity could be discharged. The bank has over $100,000,000 of gold, and a circulation of $480,000,000. The government was paying 3 per cent to the bank, but next year would pay but 1 per cent interest. The loan would average to subscribers 6 per cent; but he thought that, if France would act with wisdom, other loans could be had at a less interest. He estimated the annual value of the productions of France at about $6,000,000,000, and that a new tax yielding $85,000,000 might be collected without injuring the productive powers of the country. The new tax was confined to the raw materials of textile fabrics. Since this statement was made the loan proposed by the government has all been taken by subscription.

The address of the Pennsylvania Democracy, in the recital of the wrongs and oppressions to which the American people are subjected, does not mention, however remotely, the exactions and robberies of the protective tariff under which people are taxed nearly $600,000,000, in order to collect $150,000,000 of needed revenue. And the same address, in reciting the remedies which the Democracy will apply, omits all mention of a repeal of this protective taxation, and of a reduction of all taxation to a purely revenue standard. Taxes on coal, on horse-shoes, wagon-tires, on the iron and steel of every tool and implement of industry, and equivalent taxes on boots and shoes, shirts, coats, blankets, shawls, and carpets, are fundamental principles of Democratic policy in Pennsylvania, from which the party will take no departure.

During the month of May there was exported from England to France £822,000 of gold and silver, to supply a want of the portable form of wealth. As in all such times of civil war and insecurity, there was a general secreting of coin in France, producing an unusual scarcity which had to be supplied by importation.

The Census of Great Britain.

The returns of the census of Great Britain and Ireland, taken in April, 1871, have been laid before Parliament. The enumeration of the inhabitants is thus stated:

United Kingdom	[illegible]
England and Wales	[illegible]
Scotland	[illegible]
Ireland	[illegible]

The increase in the whole kingdom is 2,537,905, or less than 9 per cent. The increase in England and Wales is 2,887,884, or 13 per cent. Scotland has increased 296,319, or about 10 per cent; while Ireland has decreased 396,308, or nearly 7 per cent. The aggregate number of females exceeds that of the males by nearly a million, and the excess of females is in about the same proportion in England, Scotland and Ireland. The emigration from Ireland during the ten years is put down at … The total increase in the kingdom is said to be numerically greater than any preceding decennial increase, though the percentage of increase has been as high as 15 per cent. From 1850 to 1860 the increase was but 12 per cent. The population of the United Kingdom in 1871 is 22,158 greater than that of the United States in 1860. Since then the United States have increased to 38,500,000.

New York city is expected to be the seat of the next war; … the principal engagement is fixed for the 12th instant, the day on which the Orangemen, or Protestant Irishmen, parade in commemoration of the Battle of the Boyne. During a celebration of this kind, last year, the procession was set upon by Catholic Irishmen, and four persons instantly killed, others fatally, and many seriously, wounded. This year a general riot of unprecedented fierceness is threatened if the Orangemen presume to show themselves in procession. The Grand Master of the order, John J. Bond, sends a communication to the newspapers, appealing to the public against the violence of his religious opponents, and describing the threatening letters which the Orangemen are receiving. It is not expected that the police will be able to protect the procession—indeed, the department has warned them to this effect, while promising to do what they can to preserve order—and the men will, therefore, go well armed. Perhaps the general advertising of the precaution will serve as a preventive of the apprehended violence.

[From Our Own Correspondent.]

PARIS, June 21.

I have been staying here for a few days, and have seen a good deal of political society. Everything around me is suggestive and new, but the general effect is intensely painful.

When I reached the city, and drove through … from the Northern Railway, I fancied the stories of the devastation had been exaggerated. … [illegible]
